The estimate of its character entertained in the South will be found fully expressed in an editorial from the Southern Confederation of the 15th of April, and which is appended to and adopted as a part of Mr. Pettenger's deposition. The editor says:

This just and unanswerable presentation of the case appears to have produced its appropriate impression. Saveral members of the cout-martial afterwards called upon the prisoners and assured them that, from the evidence against them, they could not be condemned as spies; that they had come for a certain known object, and not having lingered about or visited any of the camps; obtaining or seeking information, they could not be convicted. About an hour was lost in waiting to allow these trains to pass, which enabled their pursuers to press closely upon them of the judge advocate.

Their counsel, however, afterwards visited the prison and read to them the written defence which he made before the Court in their behalf. The substance of that paper is thus stated by one of the witnesses. Corporal Pittenger: "He (the counsel) contended that our being dressed in citizens' clothes was nothing more than what the Confederate Government itself had authorized, and was only what all the guerrillas in the service of the Confederacy did on all occasions when it would be an ad vantage to them to do so; and he recited the instance of General Morgan having dressed his men in the uniform of our sol-
